Summarized Insights

During our Hi-Fidelity prototype presentation, we ended up taking a different approach to making various new changes. We wanted to change the colour to be much more calm to see how the client would like or dislike that idea. It seemed like the client did not like the colours and would rather keep it in the orange or yellow vibe that they have going on with their main logo. We also implemented a few different shapes and put a lot of focus into the main landing page which is something the client was looking for. They seemed to love the idea of different shapes highlighting the overall diamond shape specifically, which we took note of. There was also quite a few new features that we mentioned such as different languages for accessibility since not everyone can speak English fluently. With people being from all around the globe, it would be a great idea to implement a way for them to easily understand the content that APSS has provided for them. The client seemed to like this idea, so we will likely be moving forward with it.

Our group also mentioned adding a dark mode feature, since people like the option to choose their screen brightness and to make it easier on people's eyes. The client told us that they use dark mode in their email, and was very interested in that idea which we took into consideration. We ended up clarifying with the client about whether they wanted to keep the main website separate from the research website, but they ended up letting us know that they wanted them both on the same website. In order to go along with what the client wanted, we ended up combining our research website and our main website into one. After the presentation, we prepared a better outline for what we want to make in WordPress. As a group, we understood that First Nation representation is an important topic. During our questioning of what languages the client would like to see, we specifically mentioned languages that First Nations peoples would speak for an easier user experience.

Another topic we touched on was whether the client wanted any special effects during transitions between web pages. The client specified that there were no effects or transitions to be added, so we did not change anything about our prototype. We also received a comment about not cutting certain types of images because the message would come across in a different way than we intend. Our group learned about the $5 bill rule, where you shouldn't have a shape larger than the $5 bill on your website. We will be implementing this in our WordPress website once we start working on it more. There was also a big emphasis on the general imagery, which the client enjoyed and loved the carousel images that we had. This now gives our group a bit more of a foundation to go off from in our future builds.
